

Gratitude

By now it is a cliché to say that the world changed—permanently—on September 11, 2001. But from the tragedy, turmoil, and trauma, the rage, and the grieving reemerged positive feelings, often dormant in a complacent society: spirits of altruism, community, a purpose beyond oneself. At this holiday time of year, we are all the more conscious of our blessings, and grateful for them. Highest among these are the people we care for and who care for us—family, friends, and coworkers.

At this holiday season, more than any other, we are conscious of what matters most. Our work—and those we work with and for—has never seemed more meaningful. JCP exists to help people, to improve the care of patients with mental illnesses. It exists because of scientists and clinicians who work hard and are willing to share their products with colleagues and because of a superb editing and publishing staff that works on the Journal every day. It also depends on the intelligence, scholarship, knowledge, and generosity of the following peers, who anonymously reviewed JCP manuscripts between November 15, 2000, and November 16, 2001. At a time of renewed valuing and appreciation of friends and colleagues, these ladies and gentlemen have my utmost gratitude.
